The reputation he acquired in the County court pointed him out, in lated to appail and baille the most effort to grapple with these difficulties, he manifested such capacity for public business that, in spite of his own disinc ination, and even againt his own protest, he was nominated and elected for a second legislative term in 1872. In truth, Mr. Ferguson had always a distaste for the practical handling of polities, which increased to absolute regnance as his experience ripened. No man was better qualified for legislative business than he; his mind was richly stored with historical knowledge and the principles my, and well yersed in the conduct of public business; but the routine of canvassing and conventions, with its petty in rigues; its personal jealousies; its subordination of principle to party expediency, in short the inherent baseness of that nsane scramble for office, which, in these days has usurped the place of true statesmanship, inspired his proud nature with contempt and loathing. Robert Ferguson in fact was a statesman in the highest sense of the word, as distinguished from the average professional politician, and it is for this reason especially that we despair of se ing his like again, for the political atmosphere is becoming more and more unit for such men to breathe ia; they are
